Annibal, is. m. A Carthaginian of great valour and conduct, well versed in all the stratagems of war. While he was a boy, his father Amilcar, made him swear at the altar, that when he was grown up he would make war with the Romans, and never make any peace with them. Accordingly when he was of age, he passed over into Spain, beat the Gauls at the river Rhosne, then marched his army over the Alps, vanquished Sempronius the Roman consul at Trebia, routed the consul Flaminius at Trasimene, and though worsted a little by Q. Fab. Maximus, he recovered new courage, and fought with two consuls Paulus Aemilius and Terentius Varro, and entirely defeated them, forty thousand foot, and two thousand seven hundred horse falling in that field; and had he marched directly to Rome, as he was advised, it is probable there had been an end of the Roman name. But, happily for for Rome, he led his troops to Capua, where they were so besotted with the rich wines of Italy, as never to be under any command afterwards. At length being overcome by Scipio Africanus, he fled to Bithynia, and ended his life by poison, which for that purpose he had reserved in a ring.

Antoninus Commodus was the successor to his empire, but not to his virtues.

M. Antonius, An eloquent orator, slain with many other great men by the Marian faction. He had two sons, Marcus and Caius, the former whereof was a very profligate man. The latter commanding some troops of Sylla's horse, plundered many places in Greece. Marcus Antonius, son of the former of these, and grandson to the orator, was the fomenter of the civil war: For being tribune, he left the city privately, and fled into Gaul to Cesar. He invaded the province of Brutus, and by the persuasion of Cicero, the senate voted him an enemy to the republic. He was beaten by the two consuls Hirtius and Pansa, and young Cesar; but long after he joined in a league with Octavius and Lepidus, and so their government was called a triumvirate. Immediately upon this he vanquished the forces of Brutus and Cassius at Philippi in Macedon. He divorced his wife Fulvia, to marry Octavia sister to Octavius. For the love he bore to Cleopatra queen of Egypt, he divorced her also, which Octavius resenting, made war upon him, overcame him in a sea fight at Actium, and forced him to flee to Alexandria, where, being besieged by Cesar, in despair he fell on his own sword.

Julius Antonius. The son of Marcus. He was consul with Paulus Fab. Maximus. To this man Horace addressed his second ode of the fourth book. He was guilty of notorious incontinence with Julia the daughter of Augustus.
